CrossMark

Editorial

Philip Cook[1] · Sune Lægaard[2]

Res Publica is developing positively. The volume of submissions has increased steadily (in 2015 we received 89 article submissions, compared to 68 in 2010). Importantly, we attract work by both new and established academics. We are very proud of our Post-Graduate prize and the excellent work of younger scholars it showcases.

To support the growth of the journal, we are delighted to announce a new team of Associate Editors:

Dr. Clare Chambers (Cambridge University)
Dr. Alasdair Cochrane (University of Sheffield)
Dr. Chiara Cordelli (University of Chicago)
Dr. Göran Duus-Otterström (University of Gothenburg)
Dr. Emily McTernan (University College London)
Dr. Ben Saunders (University of Southampton)

As Ben Saunders is changing role to Associate Editor, we are also introducing a new Book Reviews editor:

Dr. Jesse Tomalty (University of Stirling)

This new team will increase our capacity to handle the greater number of submissions, and add a range of valuable editorial expertise to cover different disciplinary areas.

✉ Philip Cook
Philip.Cook@ed.ac.uk

Sune Lægaard
laegaard@ruc.dk

[1] Edinburgh, UK

[2] Roskilde University, Roskilde, Denmark

The ambition of Res Publica is to be a journal ranging across moral, legal and political philosophy. We have a particular interest in work that addresses the relationship between theoretical developments and public affairs. Our vision is based on the view that there are a number of common points of interest between moral, legal and political philosophy, and that many debates in these different fields take place on the basis of shared approaches and theoretical orientations. Res Publica therefore aims to provide a venue for work addressing especially the intersections between moral, legal and political philosophy that are not sufficiently covered by more specialised journals in each field.

We are very happy to welcome our new team of Associate Editors, and look forward to developing Res Publica further together.